It's a tomato mystery!

For the past week, people in Dublin have been amused by a tomat-ally strange mystery: who's leaving tomatoes on Drumcondra Bridge? It all started during a cold snap when a photo of frozen cherry tomatoes on the bridge went viral online.

Soon, people began adding their own tomatoes, and even tomato-based products like soup and ketchup! Visitors from near and far joined in the fun, but the council has now asked everyone to stop, despite it being a huge sauce of entertainment!

Museum of haha-happiness

The world's first museum of laughter has opened in Zagreb, Croatia, and it's already spreading smiles! The HaHaHouse is packed with playful exhibitions and bright and funky colours. The fun starts as soon as you step through the door, where visitors pass through a 'happy portal' - a spiral slide that lands them in a laughter-filled playground. It's a place "where everyone, no matter their age or sense of humour, will find something to smile about!"

Brains clean during sleep

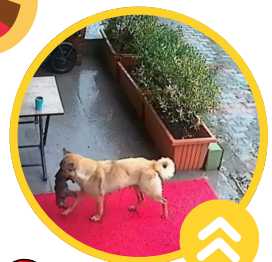

We all know that sleep is super important, now scientists may have discovered another advantage. Research on mice shows that during deep sleep, blood vessels in the brain squeeze and relax, helping to pump fluid around and clear out waste. Next, scientists will look to whether the same process occurs in humans!

Rare spherical egg to raise money for charity

A farmer in Devon has found an extremely rare egg that's shaped like a perfect sphere. Ali Greene, who handles around 30,000 eggs every week, says this round egg is a "one in a billion" find. It's so special that it's going to be auctioned off in March, and all the money will go to charity. Ali joked that whoever buys it probably won't eat it - they'll put it on a shelf like a treasure! A similar egg sold for £200 last year, so who knows how much this one will go for. Would you eat it?

Mother dog saves puppy by taking it to the vet

The amazing moment a mother dog took her sick puppy to the vet has been caught on camera and is capturing hearts across the world. The CCTV footage shows the determined dog walking through the rain holding the pup in her mouth as she took it to a vet clinic in Istanbul, Turkey. The puppy was in critical condition, but thanks to its quick thinking mum and prompt treatment, it is now recovering. Once the pup has recovered fully, the clinic hopes to find them both a loving home.
